

To Whom It May Concern:

I recently discovered that Verizon has plans to install a eighty-foot tower within the riparian zone on Tisbury Great Pond. As an owner, and someone who has a great appreciation for the no-build rules on the pond, I find this to be a tragic and terrible idea. If construction is approved on this precious land, what's to stop the next person from building more things on this land? This would be a very bad precedent to set in such a special place. This is one of the last few places on earth where you cannot see wires or towers, yet still be only a few miles from civilization. Given the existing protection of this land, I am surprised that this is even on the table.

Thank you,
